"And approaching the fire-place, Marsanne dropped the purse upon the glowing. embers, which instantly consumed it. There was something noble and solemn in the action of the Count; the blood of the French charalings, those leval subjects of French chevaliers, those loyal subjects of beauty, had been stirred in the veins of their descendant by the recital of this blamable

"Allow me to tell you, sir, that the mer of your generation, accustomed to live with courtezans, and to seek venal and readymade loves, are ignorant of what is due to women because they are women. None make more allowance than I do for the levilies of youth. But what I blame is, that in utter wantonness, and for the gratification of an idle curiosity, you lift the curtain shrouding a secret, and pour out misery and desolation upon a poor woman, more deserving, perhaps, of censure than of utter condemnation. Be not more severe than a husband,—you, a young man, liable to profit by such errors; and remember that a true gentloman will respect women even in their weaknesses. Weigh my words, M. de Movillez; you will not be offended at my frankness."

A few hours after this scene, the Counlies of youth. But what I blame is, that

A few hours after this scene, the Coun-ess de Marsanne, alone in her boudoir, and busy with her embroidering frame, re-ceives a visit from her husband. Just returned from one hunting party, and about to start upon another, the incorrigible sportsman is seized with remorse at the solitude to which his wife is condemned, hance assumed a singular paleness, and it was all he could do to master his emotion ""A pretext is easily found: a quarrel was all he could do to master an emotion and say to his wife:

"You have lost your purse?"

"Yes, replied the Countess, unebser-vant of her husband? sgitation; or, rather, I have mislaid it in some corner."

"Oh! by no means. A little green sik purse, my own work, and nealry

"The Count remained motionless, like a man struck by a thunderbolt.
"You have no commissions for Plessy?"

he at last articulated, breathing short and quick, and not knowing what he asked.

"I thought you just said you were going to Orleans," replied the Countess.

"I shall visit Plessy on my return."

"Then kiss my little godson Henriot. Much pleasure to you; and return as soon as nossible."

as possible.'
"Marsanne raised the Countess's hand to his lips, and left the boudoir; but he stag-gered like a drunken man, and was obliged to support himself by the bannister in order to reach his room.

"Towards the middle of that night, a

"I owards the muote of this light, belated passenger through the Rue d'Anjon would have witnessed a curious spectacle. Although the cold was intense, a window was wide open, and by the light of a lamp a man was to be seen leaning upon the balustrade. e zed at the young man for a brie. space and then resumed.

"Listen to me, M. de Vassigny, The law authorized me to assassinate you, but that is not a gendeman's revenge. The law further authorized me to have my dishonor certified by a commissary of police, and to drag you before the tribuhals for condemnation—to six months' imprisonment and a few thousand francs' damages! Mockery!! My instinct of honor rejected such an alternative. An honorable man revenges himself of an outrage by meeting his offender bare-breasted, and with equal weapons. You think as I do, sir?

"Your seconds, your time, your arms?" cried Vassigny, all his courage revived by this appeal to the point of honor.

"'Patience, sir—patience. The time will come when we shall meet face to face; but the hour of that mortal combat has not yet tolled."

" I wait your orders; from this day forward I am ready.'

resumed.
"" Whatever be the issue of our duel, sportsman is seized with remorse at the solitude to which his wife is condemned, and, touched by her resignation to a lonely and cheerless existence, he generously resoives to sacrifice his own pleasures to her happiness. He proposes that they should go to Italy, and pass the winter at Florence or Naples, where he trusts to wean himself from the chase and acquire a taste for domestic eujoyments. The Countess refuses to take advantage of the generous impulse, professes ther sincere friendship for her husband, but avows that her love for him has fled, driven from her heart by suffering and neglect.

"At this moment Madame de Marsanne's maid came to tell her that her bedroom was ready for her reception. Then she added:

"At these words, Marsanne's countemance assumed a singular paleness, and it at the theatre or club will suffice."

""What, sir!" replied Marsanne, 'you, who know the world and its greedy curiosily as well as I do, can you think that it will be satisfied with a frivolous pretext, and will not strive, by cruel investigation, to penetrate our secret? No, sir! to-day a duel would leave too large a field for conjecture; our meeting must be prepared long beforehand. In this night of agony have calculated everything: the interests of my vengeance, the interests of my honour, the interests of a woman whom I still love."

BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.
THE above Periodicals are reprinted in N. York, immediately on their arrival by the British steamers, in a beautiful clear type, on fine white paper, and are faithful copies of the originals Blackwood's Magazine being an exact fac-simile of the Edinburgh edition.

The wide-spread fame of these splendid periodicals renders it needless to say much in their praise. As literary organs, they stand far in advance of any works of a similar stamp now published, while the political complexion of each is marked by a dignity, candor, and forbearance, not often found in works of a party character.

They mbrace the views of the three great parties in England—Whig, Tory, and Radical. Blackwood's and the "London Quarterly" are Tory, the "Edinburgh Review" Whig, and the Westminster," Radical. The "North British Review" is of a more Religious cast, and has for the distribution of the late Dr. Chalmers, of Edinburgh. Its literary articles are of the first order, and it is lib card in its politics.

The prices of the reprints are less than one-third of those of the foreign copies; and, while they are equally well got up, they afford all that advantage to the Inerican over the English reader.
